INTRODUCTION Browning has the fertility of the hybrid. When we have to do with poetry of such marked characteristics as Brownings, we can scarcely do better by way of commencement than get a firm grasp of his personality. Even the elementary facts of his parentage and early life are significant, and in respect of some of them it is difficult not to feel that they have a direct connection with certain salient features of his poetic thought and method. In the first place there is the fact of his mixed parentage. It is generally held that a mingling of races produces a community of conspicuous vigour, and that persons of mixed ancestry are superior in mental and physical endowment to those whose progenitors are drawn from a narrow area. Robert Browning is a case in point. Born at Southampton Street, Camberwell, then a suburban district of London, on May 7, 1812, he was the son of an Englishman married to the daughter of a German,* who had himself married a Scotswoman. Not only so, but this Englishman-- Robert Browning, the father--was the son of an Englishman who had married a Creole wife. That is to say, of Brownings four grandparents only one was purely English; one was German, one Scotch, and one Creole. Unless, therefore, the fertility of the hybrid is altogether a myth, the variety and persistence of Brownings mental energy must be connected, in part at least, with the mixture of race to be found in his immediate progenitors. Brownings Home. But whether this be so or not, it is at least certain that the circumstances of his early life were such as to give full play to the development of his genius--that is, of his inborn qualities of mind. His father was for fifty years a clerk in the Bank of England; his mother, according to Carlyle, the type of a Scottish gentlewoman. Besi...
