(tuang-tuang) a few times upon the ground, the pupil accompanying him with one of the decorated bamboos in each hand. Soon after this all the men join in with due solemnity, and continue for about an hour; so long, in fact, as the magician himself continues. As soon as he ceases, all of them stop, and laying their bamboos behind them, proceed to the particular business (whether hunting or fishing or whatever it might be) for which this strange ceremony was preparatory. Meanwhile not a word was spoken, and little, if any, gesticulation was used. In some cases two bamboo sticks called sok-yet (38 cm. x 3 cm.) were used at the ceremony; one stick being held in each hand and struck upon the other in the air. In former times the women might use none but smooth (i.e. undecorated) bamboos in contradistinction to the men.¹ Women and children were obliged to attend the ceremony, since it was considered unsafe for them to be far from the men when so many demons were being invoked. The women took their places in the circle, each woman sitting behind her husband, with her children in turn behind her. Between the two circles (of men and women) there was a broad space left vacant for the passage of the demons, so as to enable the latter to look at the headbands of both men and women simultaneously. The demons, especially the male ones, are not afraid of women, and hence the women did
