

Poems

These poems, the first to be published by the author, range from the philosophical where the vocabulary is starkly simple to those in which a philosophical problem is touched on with ironic wit. There are nature poems, but nature is never dealt with for its own sake: some other element always enters, be it human and personal or supranatural and numinous. There are love poems, which are erotic in situation, but where again the language operates on several levels of meaning. A number of poems are concerned with the relationship between an inner vision and the experience of the external world. At times a schism breaks the relationship, other poems deal with the brief perfection of that relationship; such moments are natural to childhood, but the loss of childhood innocence is treated unsentimentally. This theme of the spirits drive towards some kind of unity--towards a vision that would embrace and order the flux of existence--also involves the question of communication: when the schism occurs the poet is isolated and silenced.
