To be above temptation in poverty and free from corruption among the Great, is indeed such a peculiarity as deserved notice. But to be a safe companion is a praise merely negative, arising not from possession of virtue, but the absence of vice, and that one of the most odious. As little can be added to his character, by asserting that he was lamented in his end. Everyman that dies is, at least by the writer of his epitaph, supposed to be lamented, and therefore this general lamentation does no honour to Gay. The first eight lines have no grammar; the adjectives are without any substantive, and the epithets without a subject. The thought in the last line, that Gay is buried in the bofoms of the worthy and the good, who are distinguissied only to lengthen the line, is fo dark that sew understand it; and fo harsh, when it is explained, that still sewer approve. Nature,. and Nature3 laws, lay hid in night: God said, Let Newton be! And all was light. Of Of this epitaph, short as it is, the faults seem not to be very sew. Why part should be Latin, and part English, it is not easy to discover. In the Latin the opposition of Immortalis and Mortalis, is a mere found, or a mere quibble; he is not immortal in any sense contrary to that in which he is mortal. In the verses the thought is obvious, and the words night and light are too nearly allied. XIII. On Edmund Duke of Buckingham, ivho died in the lyth Tear of his Age, 1735.
